Brief Gossip

SA Based Malawian accuses Skeffa

SA based Malawian man is accusing Skeffa Chimoto of allegedly stealing a song from him on his "Ulendo" track.

The man, named Winston Maononga, said he made the song in a Malawian studio but didn't release it.

When he got to SA, he says he heard from his studio friends from Malawi that the song he made had allegedly been reworked by Skeffa - he apparently only added a reggae vibe to the song.

While these are only claims being made by Winston, he swore "Even God knows that the song is mine," while saying he has a number of witnesses including artists like Mbenjere.

Well, on his part, Skeffa ruled out the claims, by adding that its not the media's job to settle these issues.

"There's an organization in Malawi that deals with people who steal other people's intellectual property. This is not dealt with by a media house or media personnel. For your own information, my music is a ministry not just entertainment. So I don't and I can't steal anybody's music or song," he said.

Bongie Melon - A mash up princess

BY Gary Samati

Bongie Melon, an 18-year-old blessed with a heart-warming voice, has been getting Twitter engagement over a number of mash-ups she has posted, of different songs.

The female artist made trends a few weeks ago when Eli Njuchi hailed her works, asking to make a mash up together in due time.

Well, she says they're working on their collaborative project soon, which she says will probably be out this coming week.

"I've always been singing international songs around my manager so he noticed something and he brought up an idea, he was like 'why can't you try singing malawian songs?' So he suggested Eli Njuchi's songs, he took a video of me singing his songs but I never liked it and I told him not to post but he still posted it and only to see that people's feedback was positive even Eli himself," she said.
